The Hon. Alexander Mackenzie.

(From the Kingston News, Tory.)

The history of Great Britain and her colonies has afforded many illustrations of men rising from the lower ranks of life by means of steady perseverance and unceasing mental activity to places of the highest honor and greatest responsibility in the State. It has often been argued against the British monarchical system of Government that it is an almost impassable barrier to those whose ability and aspirations impel them upwards; but the facts prove the contrary. Men of humble birth have risen to occupy high positions and have lived to be honored by the nation at large. These thoughts suggest themselves by the departure of the Premier of the Dominion on an official visit to England. From the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie we differ politically. We have frequently had occasion to expose what we honestly regarded as inconsistencies in his policy, and may be under the necessity of doing so again; but we do not consider that there is any reason why, under present circumstances, we should not advert in a friendly spirit to his career, aside altogether from politics. We are not among those who allow contracted political prejudices to interfere with our estimate of the individual. There is, we are afraid, too great a tendency in this country to allow political opposition to degenerate into personal antipithy. The encouragement of this spirit and its development in our midst can only prove an unmitigated curse. Honorable party warfare is legitimate enough—is, indeed, necessary; but the making of politics the subject of personal quarrels is to be strongly deprecated. If we cannot agree we should be able to agree to differ. So long as there are Governments there will be Parties; and that we cannot all belong to one Party will not for a moment be denied. An Opposition is almost as much a necessity as a Government—that is, if the acts of Governments are to be closely watched in the public interests. He is simply a bigoted, narrow-minded, contemptible partizan who cannot recognize any merit in a political opponent. Political virtue is not confined to one class of politicians. Believing in these principles, therefore, while opposed to Mr. Mackenzie politically, we hold that there is much in his character to be admired, and his example in many respects is worthy of emulation. When Mr. Mackenzie came to this country he was, we understand, a stonemason, and for some time worked in that capacity in the erection of some of the fortifications of this city. Being of studious habits he diligently stored his mind with useful knowledge, and having a memory of a more than ordinary retentive character, the knowledge he acquired was seldom forgotten. Indomitable in his perseverance he struggled on, until, recognizing his ability, his party placed him at its head, and when a change of Government took place he was entrusted by Her Majesty's representative with the formation of a Government. Mr. Mackenzie will sail to-morrow for England, and in a few weeks, in his official capacity as Premier, he will appear in Downing street to confer with the Imperial Government on matters of Canadian interest. He carries not with him the flimsy tinsel associated with what is called noble birth as a passport to, perhaps, Her Majesty's presence; but as the head of a Government of one of the most prosperous of the Colonies he goes as its representative, and therefore as the representative of Canada. If Mr. Mackenzie is not so much of a "society man" as others of his Party, we feel certain, nevertheless, that Canada will not have any reason to feel ashamed of him. He is a fine specimen of a self-made man—one who has proved that it is quite possible to rise from the humbler to the higher walks of life—from being a stonemason to be the Prime Minister of so great a country as ours. Snobbery at times may sneer at such men, may look with contempt upon them because they were not born, as the saying is, with a silver spoon in the mouth; but all who have a just appreciation of those sterling qualities of heart and mind which go to make up a man will never refuse to accord to them that tribute of praise which is justly their due.

"The rank is but the guinea stamp,
The man's the gowd for a' that."

In fact we know of no class more deserving of praise than those who despite the disadvantages of their early days, after struggling bravely on surmounting innumerable and trying difficulties, succeeded in reaching the highest rung in the ladder of an honorable and laudable ambition. Such a man in this connection is Mr. Mackenzie. When he for the first time grasps the hand of the British Premier, Mr. Disraeli, he will meet with one who struggled perseveringly against the prejudices of class and other adverse circumstances, but who raised himself until by his own unaided efforts he became the First Commoner of the most aristocratic nation in the world. In admiration of such instances of patient and successful toil we can well afford for the time to lose sight of political differences.

To Mr. Mackenzie himself the changed circumstances under which he returns must be a source of pardonable pride. We express the hope that the trip may prove an agreeable one, and although not of a "blue blooded" nor the most accomplished of courtiers, we have every confidence that neither the honor nor dignity of Canada will suffer in his hands during his official interviews with Her Majesty's Ministers.

Niagara Falls Items.

The following Items are gleaned from the Niagara Falls Gazette:

J. S. Ryan, a photographer in the employ of S. J. Mason, in the Park, at the Falls, disappeared very suddenly some days ago and has not since been heard from.

Some days since the headless trunk of an unknown man passed through the flume of the Paper Mill on Bath Island. The remains were so far decomposed and so forbidding that they were allowed to go over the Luna Island Falls, although they might have been secured. An employee who saw the body and who learned afterwards there was a standing reward in Tonawanda for the recovery of the body of a man supposed to have been drowned in that place last winter, has made up his mind that he is out about $100.

The necessary notification preliminary to the withdrawal of the petition against the return of A. F. Macdonald, M.P. for Cornwall, in the House of Commons, appears in the Cornwall Gazette. The petitioners base their prayer for withdrawal on the fact that since its presentation changes have taken place in the law.

A meeting of gentlemen interested in the railways running from between Hamilton and Kingston in the direction of the Pacific Railway was held yesterday at the Queen's Hotel, when a resolution was passed calling upon the Toronto Local Government to decide upon some policy in reference to Ontario in connection with the trans-continental line.

A mass meeting was held in Hyde Park, London, Eng., yesterday to express sympathy for the cabinet-makers who have just been released from imprisonment. They were sentenced for accosting comrades on their way to work, and endeavoring to induce them to join in a strike. It is estimated that 80,000 people took part in the demonstration. Resolutions were adopted declaring the sentence a gross violution of personal rights. The speakers denounced laws made in the interest of a privileged class.

The boat which Mr. Rose's son used on Monday was found yesterday afternoon, bottom up, near Roache's Point, which settles all hope of their safety. The respect which all classes of the community had for the deceased has cast a heavy gloom in the town and vicinity. The telegraph offices all round the lake were frequented by eager enquirers ever since apprehension existed as to their safety. Numbers of inhabitants have gone from Newmarket to search for the bodies with lights, &c.

At a meeting of manufacturers held the other day the Provincial Minister of Agriculture informed them that the Government would take charge of goods while en route to and from the Centennial Exhibition. More than that has not been determined upon at present. It was especially advised that the manufactured articles to be sent should be good and plain, not fancifully ornamented, or of too gingerbread a class. The Government of Ontario is pursuing a commendable policy in doing all it can to advance the interests at home and abroad of her manufacturers, and the indications are that not only are its efforts appreciated but that the response will be very creditable indeed to the keystone Province.

Not long since two or three financiers of Liverpool went in for a big spec in rice. They realized and netted a large profit. Pleased with their success, they resolved to celebrate the lucky coup by a little spread. A party of six sat down to dinner, and the bill came to £150—just £75 a head. Ten dozen chickens were killed to provide one dish composed solely of the "oyster cuts" out of the back, and £100 was spent in flowers and decorations for the room.

Water color paintings, a branch of art of comparatively recent origin, now realize almost as large prices as paintings in oil. Fortuny's "Moorish Carpet Merchant," said to be a miracle of color, was sold not long ago in London for $7,500. At another sale of water colors, "Nottinghamshire," by Southall, brought $8,600; "School in Cairo," by J. F. Lewis, $6,195, and "Prayer," by the same artist, $5,880.

The Marquis and the Marchioness of Bute are just about to start for the Holy Land (they will find it very hot), and they are taking a photographer with them. There is some talk of the Marquis of Ripon accompanying them.

Inaccurate Euphemism.—Why are lodgings to let almost always advertised not as "Rooms," but "Apartments?" "Apartments" for single gentlemen are all very well, but surely "Togetherments" would be more suitable to man and wife.

Great Britain.

MINISTERIAL EXPLANATION OF THE CONTINENTAL SITUATION.

London, May 31.—In the House of Lords this evening, Earl Russell asked that the correspondence between Great Britain and the Continental Powers, arising out of the recent war alarm, be laid before the House.

The Earl of Derby, Minister of State for the Foreign Department, replied that he sympathized with the curiosity of those who had watched the course of foreign affairs during the last few weeks. The Government desired to conceal nothing it had done, but it would be impossible to give a fair account without largely using confidential communications relating to the policy and opinions of other Governments, who would object to such a disclosure. The publication of these communications would prevent English diplomatists from receiving information in future, and to submit a mutilated correspondence might mislead the House. The causes of dispute were liable to recur; therefore it was not desirable in the interests of peace to give publicity to the debates of the controversy. Lord Derby then proceeded to state that persons highest in authority in Berlin of late openly declared that the French army had become a source of danger to Germany, because its magnitude showed a determination on the part of France to renew the war; that Germany, in self-defence, might feel impelled to strike the first blow to secure peace; and it was necessary that the French army should be considerably reduced. This language, repeated by German representatives here and elsewhere, created extreme uneasiness in France. The French Government immediately disclaimed all warlike intentions. Lord Derby said he accepted the declaration as entirely sincere and that he believed no statesman in France contemplated the renewal of the war. France, after her humiliation, naturally desired to have an army which would give her that influence to which she considered herself entitled. One of the difficulties was that the French were unable to conceive that the German apprehensions were genuine. They regarded the representations made by Germany as the pretext for a fresh war. It seemed to Her Majesty's Government that there was a mutual misunderstanding which might lead to grave consequences, for Germany's next step might have been a formal request for France to discontinue her armament, while France, on the other hand, would probably accelerate it, thereby confirming the suspicions of Germany. The existence of this mutual distrust afforded a good opportunity to offer the friendly offices of England. The Russian Government saw things in the same light, and the visit of the Emperor Alexander to Berlin supplied the means of supporting England's representations. Lord Derby concluded by declaring that England had done her duty without sacrifices past, present or prospective. She had entered into no engagements and made no pledges, but her policy of non-intervention did not mean isolation or indifference to the peace of Europe.

The House of Commons to-night resumed the consideration of the question of privilege. The motion offered by the Marquis of Hartington on May 4th was taken up. It was to the effect that the House should not entertain any complaint with respect to the publication of its proceedings except in cases of wilful misrepresentation, or when publication is prohibited, and that strangers shall not be obliged to withdraw unless they are disorderly or by special direction of the House. Mr. Disraeli then moved that if attention is called by any member to the presence of strangers, the House shall decide by a division whether they withdraw; furthermore, that the Speaker be empowered to order their withdrawal whenever he thinks fit.—Adopted.

A meeting of Conservative members of Parliament was held at the residence of Mr. Disraeli to-day, when an understanding was arrived at as to the general policy of the Government on the question of privilege. No reporters were present.

Obituary

ADMIRAL OSBORNE.

During the last month the scientific world has lost three prominent men, whose deaths have not been generally noticed in the press. The first of these is the English Admiral, Sherard Osborne, one of the Arctic navigators of the past. He entered the Royal navy at the age of 15, and afterwards served on the East India and China stations until 1843. In 1849 he was a volunteer in the expedition which in that year left England in search of the lost ships of Sir John Franklin. His zeal and intrepidity in boat and sledge expeditions, and in the exploration of the Arctic coasts of Melville Bay, were recognized by his appointment to the command of the Pioneer, which, in 1852, took part in a second and more extended expedition to the same region. He served in the Black Sea during the Russian war, was at the bombardment of the Chinese forts in 1857, landed the English expeditionary force in Mexico in 1861, and suppressed piracy in the Chinese seas in 1862. He retired on half-pay in 1864. He has long been a member of the Royal Geographical Society; and was the prime moving cause of the resolution to fit out the Alert and Discovery for the new Arctic expedition. He was not only an able seaman, but was also well known in the world of letters, and was a frequent contributor to the Transactions of the Royal Geographical Society and Blackwood.

A. G. FINDLAY.

Alexander Findlay, the geographer, was almost as well known in America as in England. He was born in London Jan. 6, 1812. His earlier days were occupied in geographical and hydrographical compilations in the form of maps, atlases and charts. About 1834, he constructed his well-known atlases of ancient and comparative geography. One of his first works of sterling worth to the maritime world was the "Directory for the Coasts and Islands of the Pacific Ocean." In 1858, he commenced, and before his death accomplished, the great work of preparing his series of "Nautical Directories" for the whole world, comprising nearly 6,000 pages, which are now accepted as standard authority the world over. The London Athenæum says of his incidental labors:

Ocean currents was a subject to which he gave great thought, endeavoring to unravel the system of Nature's laws for the use and advantage of the seamen; and the Journal of the Royal Geographical Society is indebted to his fertile brain and ready pen for some valuable contributions to its contents on this as well as other subjects. Although Mr. Findlay's works are principally hydrographical, yet he took part in geographical discussions, and devoted much time to his friend Dr. Livingstone's labors, for whose spirit of determination he had much admiration—indeed, the question of the sources of the River Nile was the last subject of his careful investigation. In Arctic matters he took a deep interest at the time of Sir J. Franklin's catastrophe, sifting the sad question of his route in an able paper, contained in the twenty-sixth volume of the Society's Journal.

SAMUEL HEINRICH SCHWABE,

the astronomer, died recently. In December, 1827, he discovered the eccentricity of Saturn's ring with respect to the planet. In 1835, he made a series of physical observations of Halley's comet, but his principle astronomical work was his long course of observations of the solar spots, whence was led to the remarkable discovery of their periodicity in number and frequency about every ten or eleven years. For this he received the gold medal of the Royal Astronomical Society of London in 1857.

George Eliot.—Mrs. Henry M. Field wrote of George Eliot: The appearance of George Eliot, or Mrs. Lewes, has been often described. There was a very good portrait of her in the exhibition last year at the Royal Academy. No one who had ever seen her could mistake the large head (her brain must be heavier than most men's), covered with a mass of rich auburn hair. At first I thought her tall; for one could not think that such a head could rest on an ordinary woman's shoulders. But, as she rose up, her figure appeared of but medium height. She received us very kindly. In seeing for the first time one to whom we owed so many happy hours, it was impossible to feel towards her as a stranger. All distance was removed by her courtesy. Her manners are very sweet, because very simple, and free from affectation. To me her welcome was the more grateful as that of one woman to another. There is a sort of free masonry among women, by which they understand at once those with whom they have any intellectual sympathy. A few words, and all reserve was gone. "Come, sit by me on this sofa," she said, and instantly seated side by side, we were in deep conversation. It is in such intimacy that one feels the magnetism of a large mind informed by a true woman's heart; then as the soul shines through the face, one perceives its intellectual beauty. No portrait can give the full expression of the eye, any more than of the voice. Looking into that clear, calm eye, one sees a transparent nature, a soul of goodness and truth, an impression which is deepened as you listen to her soft and gentle tones. A low voice is said to be an excellent thing in woman. It is a special charm of the most finely cultured English ladies. But never did a sweeter voice fascinate a listener—so soft and low that one must almost bend to hear. You can imagine what a pleasure it was thus to sit beside this gifted woman, and hear her talk of questions interesting to the women of England and America. But I should do her great injustice if I gave the impression that there was in her conversation any attempt at display. There is no wish to "shine." She is above that affectation of brilliancy which is often mere flippancy. Nor does she seek to attract homage and admiration. On the contrary, she is very averse to speak of herself, or even to hear the heartfelt praises of others. She does not engross the conversation, but is more eager to listen than talk. She has that delicate tact—which is one of the fine arts among women—to make others talk, suggesting topics the most rich and fruitful, and by a word drawing the conversation into a channel where it may flow with a broad, free current. Thus she makes you forget the celebrated author, and think only of the refined and cultivated woman. You do not feel awed by her genius, but only quickened by it, as something that calls out all that is better and truer. While there is no attempt to impress you with her intellectual superiority, you feel naturally elevated into a higher sphere. The conversation of itself floats upward into a region above the commonplace. The small-talk of ordinary society would seem an impertinence. There is a singular earnestness about her, as if those mild eyes looked deep into the great, sad, awful truths of existence. To her life is a serious reality, and the gift of genius a grave responsibility.

The American Riflemen

The contest for the Leech Cup on Saturday, (says the N. Y. Herald) tried the mettle of our riflemen, and the work they did showed clearly that the honor of the country may be safely left in their keeping. The scores made by the principal members of the team have seldom been surpassed and perhaps have never been equalled in the aggregate by four members of any team. Colonel Bodine, whose skill and nerve secured victory for America, won the Leech Cup with one of the highest scores on record. Messrs. Fulton, Gildersleeve and Coleman pressed him very closely, and it may be said to have been a neck-and-neck race between the latter gentleman for the second place. Mr. Coleman's score is especially honorable, because it was the first time he ever shot on the new target.

We append a few of the higher scores:

Col. John Bodine	205
Col. H. A. Gildersleeve	193
Major Henry Fulton	198
R. C. Coleman	195
L. L. Hepburn	191
A. V. Canfield, Jr.	177
Capt. L. C. Bruce	176
H. S. Hewell	176

The New York Herald says: The day was clear, bright and warm, the wind gentle, and blowing up the range in a direction almost parallel to the line of fire.

The match is the first that has come off in this country at the new target lately adopted from the Wimbledon model, which prescribes a circular, instead of a square bull's eye. As will be seen from the scores published below the records of yesterday's shooting are far ahead of anything that has ever been done in front of the old square bull's eye.

What was done yesterday may now be compared with scores made by the Irish riflemen at their late practices in Dublin and Belfast. It is already on record that in Ireland 208, 203 and 202 have been made at the new targets, Mr. McKenna, of Belfast, having been credited with the highest of the scores mentioned above. The highest score yet made in America before a long range target was achieved yesterday by Colonel Bodine, who won the Leech Cup on a record of 205 out of a possible 225. It will be remembered that the other day, Colonel Bodine made 162 points out of a possible 180, the highest aggregate attained this season at any of the contests for places on the American Team or the subsequent practices of this team. These records place Colonel Bodine alongside with, if not ahead, of Major Fulton, and at any rate his victory yesterday puts him for the coming year at the head of American riflemen and confirms his right to the title of "Old Reliable," with which riflemen have saluted him.

Only meagre reports of the practice in Ireland have reached this side of the Atlantic; but, without going into tiresome details of figures, it is safe to state that there is hardly the flip of a copper's difference in choice between the two international teams.

Bogardus vs. Paine.

GRAND PIGEON MATCH FOR TWO THOUSAND DOLLARS AND THE CHAMPIONSHIP—BOGARDUS THE WINNER—AN EXTRAORDINARY SCORE.

Captain A. H. Bogardus, of Elkhart, Ill., and Ira A. Paine, of this city, again came together yesterday in a pigeon shooting contest. The occasion had long been looked forward to by the large number of gentlemen of this vicinity who knew the skill of these men with the gun, and as the stakes were unusually large the interest became widespread and assumed a speculative tendency. Not alone were sporting men generally desirous of witnessing the decision of the long mooted question as to which of these two crack shots was the superior, but members of the Union and other clubs took up the question, bet their money and attended the shoot to see for themselves how the contestants acted at the score. Prospect Park Fair Grounds was the place selected to decide the event, and at two o'clock 500 or 600 gentlemen were there gathered and anxiously awaiting the call of the referee.

The match was for $1,000 a side, 100 birds each, 30 yards rise, 80 yards boundary, five traps and Hurlingham rules to govern, which requires the gun to be held below the armpit until the bird is on the wing. Paine being the challenger allowed Bogardus $50 for expenses, which in reality made the stakes $1,050 against $1,000. Mr. Parks was selected referee. The birds were furnished by Miles L. Johnson, and, as a lot, were strong and rapid flyers. Bogardus used a Scott breechloader, 13 bore at the muzzle and 12 at the breech, while Paine shot with a Grant muzzle-loader, 11 bore, which difference of guage allowed Bogardus under the rules 18 inches the advantage of the range, Paine standing at the score and the Captain having one foot advanced beyond it, the distance noted as above.

At eighteen minutes past two o'clock Paine went to the trap, and at this juncture the betting in the pools was:—Bogardus, $50; Paine, $35. Two bets of $500 to $400 was made by the Captain's backers. A brisk southeast wind was blowing throughout the shoot. Paine opened the ball and brought down his first bird with the second barrel, and continued with capital luck until he had to his credit nine dead pigeons, when he broke and missed the tenth. Meanwhile Bogardus had secured but eight out of his ten, one of which, shot through and through, managed to get beyond the boundary. By this time the general bearing of the shooters at the score had been compared and commented upon, Bogardus receiving much commendation for his sportsmanlike manner and the chance he invariably gave his birds. At the twentieth bird Paine had grassed eighteen, while Bogardus, in the same number, had scored but sixteen, which gave Ira the lead by two pigeons. Friends of the latter now rushed to the pool box and made him bring even terms with the Captain, which, no doubt, was very pleasing to the Western delegation. When thirty birds had been trapped by each the scores stood—Paine, 23; Bogardus, 23—a tie—which some looked upon at this stage of the game as being very singular. The better informed hardly deemed it accidental, but set it down as one of the plans of the Captain to make the occasion more entertaining. Paine cut down six in his next ten, so did the Captain, another singular coincidence, and Paine going off and killing ten others dead as a stone, and Bogardus allowing three of the number to escape, the score at the fiftieth bird stood—Paine, killed, 39; missed, 11. Bogardus, killed, 36; missed, 14. This put the former three birds ahead, half-way around the game, and many imagined it looked serious for the Western champion. His friends, however, were buying all the pools they could secure, having kept him the favorite at $50 to $10. A rest of twenty minutes was now taken and the guns were cleaned.

Paine came to the front for the fifty-first bird very confident, cut it down magnificently and repeated it satisfactory for eight others in the ten, missing but one—the fifty-eighth—a rattling customer, which gave him forty-eight out of sixty. When the Captain again took his place there was danger in his eye, and he shot in style. He knocked dead nineteen birds in succession, making many difficult shots at such long ranges as to call forth repeated cheers. His seventieth bird, a driving black, was missed and then he went on shooting and tumbled over the strongest character of pigeons ever sent from a trap, until at the eighty-fourth, when he led Paine one bird. It was the first time in the contest that such had been their relative position. During this extraordinary exhibition by the captain his opponent had also done splendidly, yet missing just the number to give Mr. Bogardus the advantage. From this time the match was practically over; the wonderful shooter from the West killing just as many birds as he liked. Paine couldn't stop his eighty-eighth and eighty-ninth, nor could he secure the ninety-seventh, which placed the Captain four ahead. The latter missed his final pigeon, which won him the match by three birds, the score being—Bogardus, 84 killed, 16 missed; Paine, 81 killed, 19 missed.

The appended resume will show the most extraordinary score, on the part of Bogardus, ever made in pigeon shooting at such long range and under the English rules. He killed 48 straight out of the last 50, every one rattlers and some leaving the traps as strong as ducks. With five falling dead out of bounds Bogardus in reality killed 89 out of his 100 birds.

The Captain, under the rule, used 1¼ ounce shot and 5 drachms of powder in each shell (of paper), the latter being of 12 gauge size. His gun weighs 10 lbs. exactly, and the shot used by him was No. 8 in the right hand barrel and No. 7 in the left hand barrel.

Monument.—A monument to the Rev. Joseph Hughes, one of the founders of the Religious Tract Society of which he was Secretary, as also of the British and Foreign Bible Society, was unvailed at Bunhill-Fields, May 3, in the presence of Lord Shaftesbury, Sir Charles Reed, and many friends of both societies. Mr. Hughes was born in 1769, and in 1797 was appointed pastor of the Baptist Church at Battersea, where he remained until his death in 1833. In 1799 he attended a meeting which led to the formation of the Tract Society, and in 1804 he published a pamphlet advocating the general circulation of the Scriptures at home and abroad, which brought about the establishment of the Bible Society. The monument is a square obelisk.

The Probable Compensation of the Lawyers in the Beecher Trial.

(From the Brooklyn Eagle.)

The pay of the lawyers in the scandal case is a subject which excites more or less curiosity. The following are the facts current: That Fullarton was paid by Moulton in the Proctor case, which, it will be remembered, was not tried; and that he appears in the Beecher case as the especial representative of Mr. Moulton—his fee of $5,000 being the only money he has as yet received. Beach, who is ordinarily a high-priced lawyer, came into the case believing that it would be over within a month at the outside. He received a retainer of $1,000, and looked mainly to the enhancement of his already high reputation. When it was seen that this case would last for months, Mr. Beech, it is said, felt that he could not remain in it, except at a very serious pecuniary sacrifice on his part. At the time it was reported that he desired to withdraw from the case. Report has it that his retainer was then raised to $2,500—$1,000 of the additional $1,500 being the contribution of a lady whose name has sometimes cropped out in the newspaper discussion of the case as one especial friend of Mr. Tilton's. It is doubtful if Mr. Pryor has secured any fee. Mr. Morris is working for glory in the case, and it is said not only gives his services for nothing, but contributes to the petty expense account of the trial beside. On the Beecher side, nothing has been said about fees. A great deal of money has been spent in hunting up witnesses, preparing testimony, etc., and the lawyers engaged on this work draw on Mr. Thomas Shearman as they need money. Evarts is believed to be in receipt, for years past, of an income of $50,000 per annum from his profession. He has lost very nearly a lawyer's year in this case. In all probability his fee will be $25,000—more, perhaps, if the jury should find unanimously for Beecher. Judge Porter has paid no heed to the question of his compensation in this case. No doubt his great services will be justly remunerated; his fee will probably be $10,000, let the case go as it may. Shearman, Tracy and Hill are members or attendants of Plymouth Church. They came into the case rather as friends than as counsel. Mr. Patrick Keady, who has taken a more humble, but not less necessary, part in the trial than the other counsel, draws on Shearman for his necessary expenses. His compensation, like that of the bigger guns, is to be settled hereafter. The expenses of the trial will, in all probability, be borne by the old and wealthy members of Plymouth Church. Wherever Mr. Beecher could meet any expenditure attendant on his trial he has done so, and, if he were permitted, he would sell all he has got and mortgage his salary for life rather than let anybody but himself pay a penny.

A Young Bridegroom's Misfortunes.—Last week young Paddington, a reporter on The Meatax, got married. The next morning his bride availed herself of a wife's dearest privilege and went through his pockets. She found some interesting letters from tailors, boarding-mistresses and washerwomen, but these received only a passing glance. She scorned the writers. But what fascinated her attention was his private memorandum-book. She read there a number of items which revealed to her pure mind a degree of degradation and duplicity which racked her innocent breast. This is what she read: "Molly Maguire deserted September 9;" "Annie Eversham, jealous of Ida Elwood, drew pistol 14th, missed, exposure prevented by compromise, no information;" "William Mauler promises revelation of secrets of counterfeiting; 19th mem.—'How to Make Money Easy'—splendid article;" "Miss Martha Medytater—back-gate 11.30 p.m.—arrangements for elopement—parents discovered plot—true love crushed in bud;" "Michael Manahow, murderer, threatens to confess to-morrow afternoon—hush-money wanted—must see him;" and of such harrowing deeds and assignations with the wicked did she read till tears blinded her eyes, and, broken-hearted, she silently slipped from the house, and, taking the first car to Allegheny, was soon sobbing on the bosom of her father. She could only say she had been betrayed by the brute Paddington, who associated only with counterfeiters, bloodthirsty outlaws, and other awful people, the worst of her sex; and the old man patted her on the head, and took down his double-barreled gun. He reached Paddington's room before the unsuspecting monster was out of bed. He was aroused by the entrance of his frantic father-in-law, who filled the calves of both legs with bird-shot as the young man sprang to an upright position, and blew a hundred bushels of corn-husks out of the mattress, and set the bed-clothing on fire, when he rushed out, followed by the mangled reporter, crying "Murder!" The two women who were scrubbing on the stairs knew the bride had been murdered by the two maniacs, and they threw their buckets of water, chucks of soap and scrubbing-brushes after them, and yelled for the police, who were dozing against the telegraph-pole on the corner. It has all been explained; but Paddington, who has a "sub" on, and is laying up with both legs bandaged, has given out that he has gone on a visit to Philadelphia.—Pittsburg (Pa.) Leader.

Messrs. Tilton and Moulton, according to Mr. Beecher's lawyers, are a pair of black-hearted scoundrels, whom there are scarcely words in the English language to fittingly describe. Yet this same wicked pair were Mr. Beecher's chosen companions and confidants during the whole wretched business which now occupies public attention, and one of them had been his intimate friend for years before. Among the stories, which Mr. Evarts is so fond of telling the jury, ought to be included that of Bret Harte's California miners, York and Scott, who, after having been partners for a long time, quarrelled, and became deadly enemies. Their feud was the amusement of the whole settlement where they lived, and when, finally, they ran as rival candidates for the Legislature, everybody turned out to hear them speak against each other. York began, and unfolded Scott's disgraceful career very much, as Judge Porter did Mr. Tilton's, no less to the astonishment than the amusement of the audience, who had not had the privilege of knowing their fellow citizens as intimately as the speaker. When he got through it was Scott's turn. "There's naught, gentlemen," said he, "there's naught as that man hez said as isn't true. I was run outer Cairo; I did belong to the Regulators; I did desert from the army; I did leave a wife in Kansas. But there's one thing he didn't charge me with, and maybe he's forgotten. For three years, gentlemen, I was that man's pardner." A burst of applause, according to Mr. Harte, artistically rounded and enforced this climax and virtually elected Scott.—*N. Pigeon Shooting.—There will be a grand sweepstake shooting match at Deerfoot Park to-day, commencing at eleven o'clock a. m. The shooting will be all the more interesting and exciting from the fact that five hundred wild pigeons have been engaged. One of the features of the day's sport will be the attempt of Captain A. H. Bogardus to kill thirty-eight wild birds out of fifty from two ground traps placed forty yards apart, the Captain to stand on a line midway between the two traps. The exhibition match will take place at three o'clock p. m. This will be the last opportunity of witnessing the remarkable skill of Captain Bogardus with the gun before his departure for Europe.—N. Y. Herald of 31st.

The British Army.—Some time since during the administration of Mr. Gladstone, the Queen issued a warrant abolishing the purchase of army commissions. Under the old system an English officer could select any regiment he pleased by paying a certain sum of money. This act cost the British government millions of dollars, because the government indemnified the officers for the privilege of which it deprived them. Mr. Disraeli's government restored the system. The effect of this is, as Lord Cardwell, the Secretary of War under Mr. Gladstone, showed in the House of Lords debate, that the "poor officers will do all the disagreeable work and the rich officers fill the pleasant posts."

The Armament of France.—The assurances that the peace of Europe will be preserved are not made more probable by the demand which General De Cissey, the French Minister of War, has made for fifty-one million francs, to enable him to continue work on the fortifications and to purchase material for the army. At the same time this request seems to justify German fears that France may recover her military strength, though it does not prove that she intends to use it to obtain revenge. Why should not France prepare for war? None of the other nations of Europe are making the slightest preparation for peace.

A few days since William Colville, a carter, near Dunfermine, in Scotland, left home, accompanied by his dog. On the afternoon of the next day the dog came back to the house, and acted in such a peculiar and excited manner that Colville's friends resolved to follow the animal, the result being that the dog led them to a shaft of a disused coal pit in the neighborhood, and there stopped, taking its stand close by the enclosure of the shaft. Grappling irons were procured, and after these had been used for a considerable time—extending over several days—the dead body of the missing man was found and brought to the bank.

The Value of Time.—"What does it matter if we lose a few minutes in a whole day?"

Answer—Time table (days in a year, 313; working hours in a day, 8):

	Days.	h.	m.
5 Minutes lost each day is, in a year,	3	2	5
10 Minutes lost each day is, in a year,	6	4	10
20 Minutes lost each day is, in a year,	12	8	20
30 Minutes lost each day is, in a year,	19	4	30
60 Minutes lost each day is, in a year,	39	1	30

We trust that the above will touch the hearts of those who "called to see us, just for a minute."

There is a Frenchman on his travels through England who writes home that in Liverpool the hearses stand at the corners in rows, waiting for customers, just as cabs in other places.

Sir Henry Thompson on Vivisection.

(London Morning Advertiser, May 13th.)

Sir Henry Thompson's opinions upon surgical, and doubtless upon many other matters, are entitled to be received with respect. But the most learned men and the most skilful operators are not infallible on all subjects. Thus Sir Henry in his partial defence of the demoniacl practice of vivisection as at present conducted, has contrived to write a little, just a very little, absolute nonsense; and we not only take the liberty to tell him so, but shall proceed to prove it. Sir Henry Thompson endeavors to show that there are many customs annually in use amongst us far more cruel than vivisection, and less defensible. Now, here we join issue with him. We have not a word to say in defence of those disgusting and cruel fly-papers vulgarly called "catch-'em-alive ohs." We confess that we cannot endure to see them, and would never tolerate their use. Probably the addition of a little poison to the glutinous composition with which these abominable sheets of insect torture are smeared would remove the objection. But does Sir Henry Thompson pretend to say that a fly feels the same pain as one of the higher order of animals—say, for instance, a dog? If a dog's leg is torn off, can he run merrily away and feed? But if a fly chance to lose a leg, it will not prevent him from sitting on a lump of sugar a minute after: tear a leg in the same manner from a man, and in all probability he dies. Again, would Sir Henry Thompson compare smoking a wasps' nest to the destruction of human life in the caves of Dahra? Sir Henry cites the cruelty of the angler. Now, a fish is far higher in the scale of creation than a maggot or a worm. But he tells us that worms on the fisherman's hook suffer more than the dogs in the vivisector's operating-room; faithful creatures whose agonies have been so graphically described by a medical man, that it is difficult to banish the hideous picture from the mind. Now, with regard to a fish, we ask if a dog, much more a human being, were to get a flight of hooks of proportionate size to those which are used to capture fish—of let us say some three or four pounds weight, would that dog, after being dragged about for a quarter of an hour or so by these hooks fixed to a cord, should he happen then to escape with his throat and jaws torn, mangled and bleeding, rush at and greedily devour a piece of meat upon another similar flight of hooks, or display any appetite at all? But this is precisely what a fish will do. Even in fly-fishing many an angler has recovered his hook in the mouth of a salmon, trout, or grayling, lost, it may be, half an hour before, the fish rising again to the lure. A pike has been known during the last season to be hooked by two anglers one after the other, and has thus been captured, as a joint possession, by both. There never was, in our opinion, a more mistaken notion than that so charmingly conveyed by Shakspere in the well-known passage—

"The poor beetle that we tread upon
In corporal sufferance feels a pang as great
And when a giant dies."

Of course the truth of our contradiction must depend upon how the giants dies. If he, too, is wiped out of existence in an instant—say, by a railway smash—probably he feels no more than the beetle. * * * * Our opinion is that nature, whom we suppose to follow the mandates of an all-wise Providence, is far too merciful to place a large amount of capacity for suffering in worms or beetles, as we know she does not in fish. No digger can put a spade in earth without chopping worms in twain, and as neither part dies immediately, what a frightful amount of suffering the necessary culture of the earth must cause, according to Sir Henry Thompson and the vivisectionists, whose cry is to all the words—"Tu quoque." We question if lobsters can be much more speedily put to death than by being plunged into boiling water; but if Sir H. Thompson can suggest a humane method of killing lobsters, by all means let him do so. Doubtless there are many abominable and utterly needless cruelties perpetrated by ignorant, thoughtless, and barbarous persons. The fattening of geese for the sake of their enlarged livers by nailing their feet to a board and placing them before a fire, and the plucking of live turkeys and other poultry because the feathers come out more easily, are barbarities worthy of all execration; and we should like to see the perpetrators punished by the lash. Now we are about to point out a special abhorrence of our own, and that is the feeding of the snakes and serpents in the Zoological Gardens. Anything more demoralizing and sickening we have seldom witnessed than the feeding of these hideous reptiles by placing live rabbits and other small animals or birds in their cages. We have seen a bevy of young ladies looking with interest at the entire proceeding, seizure, deglution, and all. We do not believe that science is aided in the least by the serpent-house, which a great number of persons regard with abhorrence and disgust. Be this as it may, we trust that the opponents of vivisection will keep up and increase their agitation against that unholy practice. In the first place we greatly doubt if anything is gained by it; and we are certain that very little is. It is the cynical coxcombry of science, and medical students think it fine to make these barbarous experiments. For ourselves we should be sorry to intrust our lives or our health, or those of any dear to us, in the hands of an enthusiastic vivisector. We could not divest ourselves of the belief that for the sake of an experiment or an operation a man accustomed to dabble with torture at the expense of dumb animals, and to protract the agonies of cats and dogs with diabolical ingenuity, would not hesitate to deal with a fellow-creature after a similar fashion, should a scientific theory happen to suggest itself to his mind.

Tickets, Sir!—This was the way it happened in a town not far from Elmira: "One of the regular attendants at Central Church is a railroad conductor. He is regular, not so much from any personal inclination for Calvinism, as from the fact that he has a first-rate Presbyterian wife, who keeps him in the way he should go. A few Sundays since, one of the deacons was absent, and our conductor was requested to pass the plate. Of course he consented. For the first dozen pews, everything passed off well. There was a regular financial shower of nickels and dimes, and the railroad-man watched sharp, but couldn't see that anybody 'got away' without responding. Finally he came to a seat where the occupant was either busted or disinclined, for he shook his head, but made no attempt on his pocket. The conductor looked at him sharply, but no cash appeared. Then he nudged his shoulder, and softly called, 'Tickets, sir!' Again the man's head wagged horizontally, but the stamps didn't come. 'Pass, then!' whispered the conductor. Still no response. Just as the railroad chap was about to call up the fireman and brakeman to help pitch the impecunious worshipper out of doors, the regular deacon came in and relieved his proxy. The conductor says he believes in running a church the same way you would a railroad train—if a man won't pay, or hasn't a pass, let him git."

The late Baron Pigott died a member of the Church of England. His sons belong to a sect called the "Plymouth Brethren," commonly called "Derbyites." "The Plymouth Brethren" are not, as may be supposed, an emanation from Mr. Beecher's church, but a religious body founded about forty years ago, the chief peculiarity of which is that the congregation have no especial ministers, every brother and sister having a full right to "prophesy and preach." They hold that there is do true christianity in the Church or among the sects, but only among themselves. When the body of the Baron was taken to the churchyard, the clergyman of the Established Church insisted upon reading the burial service. He met the funeral at the gate, and began with the words, "I am the resurrection and the life," when, according to an English journal, "some of the mourners shouted to him to stop and others to go on. Meanwhile the bearers, commanded by one of the Baron's sons, pushed along and threw the coffin into the grave near the gate. A solicitor was then sent to say that in the name of the executors he protested against the service being read. The rector shut his book and walked quietly away with his curate." There are legal proceedings to be brought against the "Plymouth Brethren" for interfering with a clergyman in performing his duty.

Several heads of mummies were shipped from Egypt to Halifax, England. They were packed in separate boxes, and one of them got soaked in salt water on the voyage. This particular head when taken out was found to have recovered its natural outlines, the sea water having had an astonishing effect. M. D. Conway, who was present, says: "For a few minutes we saw an unmistakably Egyptian countenance, with pleasant composed expression—the face of a man who lived at least three thousand years ago. We could only say that the powerful aromatic gums which had been used had arrested the decay which the salt water had now rendered possible, and which speedily set in after the head was taken from its box and wrappings. I can never forget the lifelikeness of the face before the swift decay of flesh which followed.

A cremation company is about to be established in Zurich, in Switzerland. The shares are to be twenty francs each, and the undertaking started with the support of 500 of the inhabitants. A piece of land in the cemetry has been given to the company, and upon this it proposes to erect a furnace, a martuary, a chapel, a room for urns, &c. It is estimated that the cost will be 50,000 francs. The statutes of the company have been drawn up and submitted to the Government for authoritative sanction before operations can be commenced.

There is a man in Paris with a great project. He purposes to light that city with one lamp. He wants a big lamp, and wants to suspend it at the proper height by means of a balloon. His argument is that all Paris can be lighted on that plan as well as an opera house. The authorities have a prejudice against his plan because he boards in a lunatic asylum.

Old Time and New.

Read at the New England Society's Festival at New York, December 22, 1846, by C. Spooner, of Boston.

'Twas in my easy chair at home,
About a week ago,
I sat and puffed my mild cigar,—
As usual, you must know.

I mused upon the Pilgrim flock,
Whose luck it was to land
Upon almost the only rock
Among the Plymouth sand.

In my mind's eye I saw them leave
Their weather-beaten bark;
Before them spread the wintry wilds,
Behind rolled ocean dark.

Above that little handful stood,
While savage foe lurked nigh,
Their creed and watchword, "Trust in God,
And keep your powder dry!"

Imagination's pencil then
That first stern Winter painted,
When more than half their number died,
And stoutest spirits fainted.

A tear unbidden filled one eye,—
My smoke had filled the other:
One sees strange sights at such a time,
Which quite his senses bother.

I knew I was alone—but lo!
(Let him who dare deride me!)
I looked, and, drawing up a chair,
Down sat a man beside me.

His dress was ancient, and his air
Was somewhat strange and foreign.
He civilly returned my stare,
And said, "I'm Richard Warren."

"You'll find my name among the list
Of hero, sage, and martyr,
Who, in the May-Flower's cabin, signed
The first New-England charter.

"I could some curious facts impart,—
Perhaps some wise suggestions;
But then I'm bent on seeing sights,
And running o'er with questions."

"Ask on," said I; "I'll do my best
To give you information,
Whether of private men you ask,
Or our own renowned nation."

Says he, "First tell me what is that,
In your compartment narrow,
Which seems to dry my eye-balls up,
And scorch my very marrow?"

His finger pointed to the grate—
Said I, "That's Lehigh coal,
Dug from earth." He shook his head—
"It is, upon my soul!"

I then took up a piece of stick
(One end was black as night),
And rubbed it quick across the earth.
When lo! a sudden light!

My guest drew back, uprolled his eyes,
And strove his breath to catch:
"What necromancy's that?" cried he,
Quoth I, "A friction-match."

Upon a pipe just overhead,
I turned a little screw,
When forth, with instantaneous flash,
Three streams of lightning flew.

Uprose my guest: "Now save me Heaven!"
Aloud he shouted then;
"Is that hell-fire?" "'Tis gas," said I,
"We call it hydrogen."

Then forth into the field we strode;
A train came thundering by,
Drawn by the snorting iron steed,
Swifter than eagles fly.

Down on his knees, with hands upraised,
In worship Warren fell:
"Great is the Lord our God!" cried he,
"He doeth all things well.

"I've seen His chariots of fire,
The horsemen, too, thereof:
Oh! may I ne'er provoke His ire,
Nor at His threatenings scoff!"

"Rise up, my friend, rise up," said I,
"Your terror's all in vain;
That was no chariot of the sky—
'Twas the New York mail-train!"

We stood within a chamber small;
Men came the news to know
From Wooster, Springfield, and New York,
Texas and Mexico.

It came—it went—silent, but sure:
He started—burst out laughing:
"What witchcraft's that?" "It's what we call Magnetic telegraphing."

Once more we stepped into the street,
Said Warren, "What is that
Which moves along across the way
As softly as a cat?"

"I mean the thing upon two legs,
With feathers on its head,
A monstrous bump below its waist,
Large as a feather bed.

"It has the gift of speech, I hear,
But sure it can't be human."
"My amiable friend," said I,
"That's what we call a woman."

"Eternal powers! it cannot be,"
Sighed he with voice that faltered;
"I loved the women in my day,
But oh! they've sadly altered."

I showed him then a new machine
For turning eggs to chickens,
A labor-saving hennery,
That beats the very dickens.

Thereat he strongly grasped my hand,
And said, "'Tis plain to see
This world is so transmogrified
'Twill never do for me."

British and Foreign Bible Society.—The annual meeting of the British and Foreign Bible Society was held at Exeter Hall, London, May 5, the Earl of Shaftesbury presiding. The income of the Society for the year was £222,062; expenditure £217,390. Engagements for the present year of the Society now amount to £107,777. The total issue for the year past of Bibles, Testaments and portions of the Scriptures amount to 2,619,427 copies; of this number 1,473,037 copies were issued from the depot at home, and 1,146,400 copies for depots abroad. The report gave the following facts respecting the circulation of the Scriptures during the year in foreign countries: In France the colporteurs under M. Monod had distributed 87,400 copies. In Belgium the circulation had been 16,000 copies. The system of colportage had been extended to Luxemburg. In Holland the circulation had been from 27,000 to 30,000 copies the year previous. The total number of copies issued in Germany and Switzerland was 461,801. In Austria it was 150,458 copies; in the Italian Peninsula, 38,700 copies; in Spain, it had fallen from 77,000 copies the year previous to 50,000. The Society still has in Spain 18 colporteurs who continue their work. In Portugal the number was 8,590 copies—an increase of 3,500 copies. A revised Portuguese translation of the Bible has just been put in circulation. In Denmark the circulation has risen from 23,000 to 26,000 copies; in Sweden, from 87,000 to 100,700 copies; in Norway it has fallen from 40,000 to 25,000 copies; in Russia 181,000 copies had been issued from St. Petersburg, and 81,000 copies in South Russia; Madagascar has received 24,000 copies; India, 216,340; China, 740,000; and Brazil, 25,000. The Amharic version of the Scriptures, to be used in Eastern Africa, has been finished, and Dr. Moffat's version in Bechuana has been sold. After the reading of the report, addresses were delivered by the Archbishop of Canterbury, Earl Fortescue, the Rev. W. Morley Punshon, and the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

On Monday evening a serious accident occurred on Richmond street, London, the principal sufferer being Mrs. E. W. Hyman. She, accompanied by her niece and Miss Beardmore, of Toronto, were in their barouche, driven by Mr. William Hyman, when the horses started and threw all the occupants out in front of Mr. Puddicombe's drug store. Mrs. Hyman was picked up in an insensible condition and carried into the shop mentioned, when it was found that her arm, shoulder and face were badly bruised. Under medical treatment she was much better yesterday, and was found to be not so severely injured as at first supposed, her brain not being affected, and there being, it is thought, no internal injuries. The other occupants escaped with very slight damage, Miss Beardmore having a cut upon her face, but nothing to signify.

The other day at the Glasgow central police court a young man named Robert Hamilton was charged before Bailie Young with having attempted to pick the pockets of ladies in Ingram street. From the evidence it appeared that the prisoner, who had for some time past been a regular attender at revival meetings, was standing the other evening in a crowd which had collected in Ingram street, and who where engaged singing hymns from the hymnal published by Messrs. Moody and Sankey. While singing at the top of his voice, and apparently with high-strung devotional feeling, "Hold the fort, for I am coming," the prisoner was observed to insert his hands into the pockets of five different ladies. The last lady whom he attempted to rob seized him in the act, and caused him to be handed over to the police, who took him into custody. He was committed to prison for sixty days.

The St. Petersburg correspondent of the Journal des Debats says that there is a great mania for Spiritualist manifestations in that city just now, and that the popularity of Home is far exceeded by that which a Frenchman named Brediffe at present enjoys. Home was looked upon as something of a dilettante, for he only held his seances in those houses to which he was an invited guest, whereas M. Brediffe is always ready to "manifest" at the rate of three roubles per head to a company not exceeding ten persons. As plenty of people are willing to pay three roubles on the chance of seeing spirits, he does a very flourishing trade. The correspondent says that among the believers in M. Brediffe are several professors of science, one of whom, M. Wagner, has published his profession of faith in the last number of the European Messenger.

Serious disturbances have ocurred at Plusnitz, in the Province of Western Prussia, on the occasion of the installation of a Roman Catholic clergyman, who has subscribed to the new ecclesiastical laws imposed by the Government. A crowd of Ultramontanes belonging to the parish besieged and eventually demolished the vicarage, carrying off the newly-installed vicar by force beyond the parish boundary. The people also seized the keys of the church. Military assistance had to be summoned to quell the riot.

North Wentworth Election.

JUDGMENT OF PRESIDENT DRAPER.

In the interval between the adjournment of the Court yesterday evening and the meeting this morning, I carefully read and considered the whole evidence. The result at which I arrived in regard to the acts of the respondent and others on the polling day, and during the hours appointed for taking the polls at Davidson's Hotel, in the village of Carlisle, rendered it unnecessary in my opinion to determine any other of the charges advanced for the purpose of avoiding the election. My finding and my report to the Speaker will be limited to that one matter.

It will be convenient to begin by referring to the statutory provisions on which this charge of corrupt practices is founded. They are contained in the Ontario statutes, 32 Vic., ch. 21, sec. 66; 36 Vic., ch. 2, sec. 1 and sec. 3, sub-sec. 1 and 2.

The first of these enactments is, "Every hotel, tavern, and shop in which spirituous or fermented liquors or drinks are ordinarily sold shall be closed during the day appointed for polling in the wards or municipalities in which the polls are held; and no spirituous or fermented liquors or drinks shall be sold or given to any person within the limits of such municipality during the said period, under a penalty of $100, in every such case."

2nd. "'Corrupt practices' or 'corrupt practice' shall mean bribery, treating, and undue influence, or any of such offences as defined by this or any act of the Legislature, or recognized by the Common Law of the Parliament of England; also, any violation of the 46th, 61st, or 71st sections of the Election Law of 1868, and any violation of the 66th section of such last mentioned Act during the hours appointed for polling."

3rd. "When it is found upon the report of a judge upon an election petition that any corrupt practice has been committed by any candidate at an election, or by his agent, whether with or without the actual knowledge and consent of such candidate, the election of such candidate, if he has been elected, shall be void." And further, when it has in like manner been found "that any corrupt practice has been committed by or with the actual knowledge or (query, if this should not be and) consent of any candidate at an election in addition to his election, if he has been elected, being void, he shall during the eight years next after the date of his being so found guilty be incapable of being elected," &c., &c.

It will be seen, therefore, that the first provision above stated prohibits certain things, and subjects the persons who act contrary to the prohibition to a penalty of $100 in every such case. The second, among other things make things prohibited corrupt practices. And the third in its first branch avoids the election of a candidate found guilty of such corrupt practice, and by the second branch superadds a very severe personal disqualification.

The question I have to determine is whether the respondent is guilty to the full extent, so as to be unseated and disqualified, or so far only as to be unseated; and this question is to be disposed of on the evidence taken at the trial.

Now, it is not disputed that the 66th section above quoted was entirely set at naught in both particulars. Davidson's hotel was not kept closed during the day appointed for polling, and whiskey and beer were both given and sold in that hotel within the limits of Carlisle.

Davidson's evidence proves the house not altogether open, for there was no access proved to exist directly from the street into the bar-room, but entrance from the street into the dining room was proved, and spirituous liquors and beer were passed from the bar into the dining room. Then it was proved by Sullivan that, being outside the hotel, he saw the respondent drive up, and respondent, addressing Sullivan, or some of the people assembled, said something to this effect: "Boys, this is the first time I came to Carlisle when I dare not treat, and some one will have to treat me," and Sullivan said he would treat, and with respondent went into the house, followed by a number of persons variously estimated at from 30 to 50. Several of these drank, the respondent taking a glass of beer.

Surely no one can doubt that these facts constitute a breach of Section 66, and under the subsequent Act of the Legislature such breach was a corrupt practice. The respondent's attention had evidently been attracted previously to the law, which occasioned him to say he dared not treat, and this makes it the more remarkable that he should have so entirely overlooked or forgotten the prohibitory enactment as to having certain houses closed, and as to the sale and gift of liquors, etc. In reality he acted like one who did not know that the law requires that the house should be kept closed, and that liquor should not be sold by the tavern-keeper, or given away by Sullivan or any other purchaser, while the polling was in progress. I am compelled to attribute knowledge of the law to him, nor can I avoid the conclusion that he was a participant in its breach. He went into that house in order to accept a treat, which his own remark showed he did not imagine would be limited to himself, and which was not so limited.

The whole evidence may be thus summarized. About a dozen of the electors of North Wentworth were together some time before the election for North Wentworth, to consult as to their course, they all being of similar political views. By them and others the respondent was nominated, and ultimately accepted the nomination. James Sullivan was one of this body. There was but slight evidence given of their proceedings until the polling day. It appeared that they were not formally summoned to meet; did not keep minutes of their proceedings; appointed no chairman; but as they met one another they agreed to meet, and adjourned their meetings from time to time; and it was argued on these and similar grounds that they did not constitute a committee. But there is no magic in that word. These parties united together for the common purpose of securing respondent's election; they had some organization; they canvassed electors, procured voters' lists, got reports on which they estimated their chances of success. They are the parties, so far as appears, whose nomination the respondent accepted and acted on, and if they did not style themselves a committee or committees, they seemed to have assumed the functions which usually devolve upon such bodies. Mr. Sullivan appears to have been an energetic member, under whatever name, in supporting the respondent.

It is he who in the respondent's presence gives spirituous liquors and beer to some of the electors who were assembled on the polling day as respondent's friends, the respondent being present, with his silent consent and undeniable knowledge.

This was a corrupt practice by the express language of one of the statutes. It was committed, as I conclude, to help the respondent's election by one of his own supporters, and it was concurred in by the respondent, and, as I am willing to think, in forgetfulness at the moment of the law.

I do not found my conclusion on the question whether the respondent actually did drink any of the liquor or beer given by Sullivan, who bought from Davidson; but he was one of those who more or less actively concurred in a corrupt practice. He joined in going into the house which the law directed should be kept closed. He joined in accepting beer as a treat, or, in other words, a gift, in a literal as well as a substantial violation of the law, with knowledge of the fact and assenting thereto. It is not as if the question turned on a violation of Sec. 66, when he was prosecuted for the pecuniary penalty, and might say he was not within the law, neither having given nor sold. Until these acts were declared a corrupt practice the election was not voided, but since that declaration the effect of the 66th Section is extended. The concurrence in the commission of the prohibited act makes the candidate responsible for the newly imposed consequences.

I must report to the Speaker accordingly.

Lighthouse Illumination.—The necessity of intense illumination for lighthouses has induced the English Government to undertake various experiments with a view to realize this object. At one of their coast stations there are employed for this purpose two magneto-electric machines, each being put in motion by a two-horse power steam engine, and, excepting wear and tear, the whole consumption of material to produce the light is the coke and water required to raise steam for the engine and carbon points for the lamp in the lantern. The lamp is a delicate arrangement of machinery, holding the two carbons between which the electric light exists, and regulating their adjustment, so that while they gradually consume away the place of the light shall not be altered. The electric wires end in the two bars of a small railway, and upon these the lamp stands. When the carbons of a lamp are nearly gone that lamp is lifted off and another instantly pushed into its place. The light never goes out through any deficiency or cause in the engine and machine house, and when it has become extinguished in the lantern a single touch of the keeper's hand sets it shining as bright as ever, sending forth its illumination with a power of brilliancy far surpassing that of any other fixed light.

A colossal statue of "Germania" by the eminent sculptor Helbig, is about to be presented by the King of Bavaria to the inhabitants of Oberammergau, the scene of the world-famed passion play. The conveyance of this work of art along rough country roads and over difficult mountain passes will be a ticklish affair, requiring extraordinary mechanical appliances and very skilful management.

It has been generally remarked that ever since the National administered that unmerciful flagellating to the London Advertiser, and exposed it in a bald-headed falsehood, the efforts of the Advertiser's moral young man have been as flat as dishwater. We hope (says the Sun) he won't let a little thing like that blast his young life and envelope him in black clouds of woe—on the eve, too, of an interesting little event.

The Niagara Camp.

ANNUAL DRILL.

Niagara, June 1.

There is not much to say about the Camp yet, although to-day has been one of more bustle and work than will probably occur again during its continuance. Out on the common where the camp is pitched, where it was last year, there were a few tents in the lines marked for several of the battalions that are to be in the brigade, and a few of the men sent in advance are strolling or lounging about. As the morning wore on, however, there was a perceptible movement in the town. Public conveyances are evidently a scarce article in the normal condition of this town, for the general character of the vehicles that turned out for camp service was not of a sort that gave much assurance of their capability. However, such as they were, they were early astir, and on the move toward the dock, for it was certain that some regiments were to arrive by that route.

The following is the Brigade Staff: Col. Durie, D. A. G., Commandant; Lieut.-Col. Villiers, Brigade Major; Lieut.-Col. R. B. Denison, General Superintendent of Drill; Camp Quartermaster, Major Moore, 13th Batt; Supply Officer, Capt. Mason, 13th Batt; Musketry Instructor, Capt. Johnston, late 20th Batt; Orderly Officer, Lieut. Lloyd Jones; in charge of Camp Police, Ensign Kerr, 13th Batt; Staff Sergeants: Sergeant Baldock; Brigade Office Clerk, Sergt. J. Major Cantlin; Quartermaster Sergeant Wyld; in charge of Musketry, Sergt. Dunford; Paymaster's Clerk, Sergeant Henderson; Clerk, Supply Officer, Sergeant Willis; Police Sergeant, D. Steele, 13th Batt.

The arrivals during the day included the 13th Battalion, which came in by steamer Passport.

No. 6 Co.—Lieut. Walker, Ensign Wells.
Band, 23, and 270 non-commissioned officers and men.

The following troops are to be on the ground:

Queenston Troop—Captain Brown, Lieutenant Servos, and 39 men and horses.
Burford Troop—Captain Marshall, Lieutenant Jones, and 39 men and horses.
Welland Troop—Captain Buchner, Lieutenant House, and 39 men and horses.

Grantham Troop—Captain Gregory, Lieutenant Grobb, and 39 men and horses.

The operation of pitching tents was accomplished, considering that it must have been new to most of the men, with propriety and despatch, and where in the morning was an expanse of pasture ground, in the evening was filled with long lines of snowy tents. The men all came in in heavy marching order, carrying a day's rations in their haversacks, and in consequence there needed to be no cooking. But fatigue parties were instantly set to work preparing ranges for cooking and other indispensible conveniences to camp life. There were no attempts made to drill, and discipline even was not in any sense strict. Of course the posting of sentries was a duty that every military man will perceive could not be overlooked, and each battalion had its own lines somewhat vaguely defined by the beat assigned to them. The police department was also thoroughly appointed, for even the fatigues of the route were quite insufficient to tame some of the fellows, who appeared to think that "camp" meant a place to have a jolly good time. There is not the shadow of a doubt that this illusion will be dispelled before the camp is over, and that they will return to the bosom of their respective families wiser and better-drilled subjects of this Dominion than they are at present.

It is impossible to say yet what trifling adjuncts of civilized life are most missed and most needed. Boot-blacks would probably command very fair rates of wages, for there is an adhesive dust rises in a walk across the common that one wishes to get rid of. Beverages that are at once cooling and palatable are not easily got at, although there is no lack of booths where beer is allowed to be sold. Indeed, the sutlers are in considerable numbers, and although prohibited from selling spirits, they contrive somehow to sell a sort of beer that will intoxicate volunteers. Some of the men, towards evening, were fit subjects for the police, but the majority of these cases may be placed to account of the excitement, and it may happen there will be a little irregularity to report.

The troops mentioned are those who have come on up to the moment of writing. There were still on the road, and expected in the course of the evening and night, the Hamilton Battery, the 20th Battalion, which had been delayed in Toronto, and two battalions that were expected down by the Canada Southern Railway. The officers and members will be given in a succeeding report.

At the latest moment of writing to get off this despatch, rumor has it that in an altercation some of the men drew their bayonets, and that one man got stabbed. The story wants confirmation.

Niagara, June 2.

This morning broke with a dull sky, and during the forenoon drops of rain falling were looked upon as threatening to interfere with the work of the drill sergeants, but there was no storm, a light wind moving and the darkened sky contributing to make the day exceedingly pleasant. Rations in abundant supply were issued at five o'clock this morning, and by seven o'clock breakfast was over, and it became a question of getting to work. In the infantry regiments the order seemed to be confined to squad drill and company movements, the former being by far the most needed; also all the routine of organization for extra duties, fatigue parties, sentries and police. The battalions are amply accompanied by medical men, but it may be a subject for surprise that there is not a regimental chaplain in camp. It is true the men expect to be only one Sunday in camp, and for that day some provision will be made by volunteer clergymen. The circumstance is only noticed. The musketry practice will commence to-morrow. This important part of the instruction will be superintended by Capt. Johnston, assisted by Sergeant Dunford. The ranges are on the common west of the fort. The targets will be all in their places to-day, and the Queen's Own Rifles will go to the firing-butts to-morrow. There is some anxiety about the Q. O. R., as it was reported that a number of the men were complaining to-day. It is certain that three men fell in the ranks while at drill in the forenoon, and had to be carried to their tents. There were no complaints among the other battalions, so far as I could ascertain. Indeed, the reports by the officers were of the most cheering description; that the men were in excellent condition, and took with instinctive liking to their duty.

The Staff officers of the cavalry regiment, of which the troops have been mentioned, are Major Book, commanding; Paymaster, R. Currie; Dr. Clarke, Surgeon; Quartermaster, Surpell: Captain-Adjutant Spillett; Veterinary Surgeon, Elliot. To-day the troops are engaged in the morning at sword and carbine exercise, and have a mounted parade in the afternoon. They expect to have a regimental parade to-morrow. This arm of the Brigade will look uncommonly well, the whole of the troops being uniformly dressed, and the men have most commendably come in upon their best horses.

The 20th Rifles came in last night in splendid condition. The Staff officers are Major Allan, commanding; Captain Curry, acting major; Adjutant, Keating; Dr. Ogden, surgeon; Dr. Appelbe, assistant surgeon; Paymaster, Captain Switzer, Quartermaster, Applebe.

The 39th Norfolk Rifles came in late last night, and slept on the bare ground; a pretty hard piece of furniture, some of them said, but they will get blankets immediately. The Battalion looks well.

The staff-officers are Lieutenant-Colonel S. P. Maber, Major McLaren, Major Ryan, Adjutant Heath; Paymaster Livingston; Quartermaster Foley; Dr. Phelan, Surgeon; Dr. Hayes, Assistant Surgeon.

The Welland Battery came in late last night, and the men are at work on guns and accoutrements, cleaning up. The officers are Captain King, commanding, Lieutenant McCracken; Dr. Mack, Surgeon, and seventy men and fifty horses. There is still one battery and one troop to report themselves: they are expected to-night. The entire force of all arms will be on the ground to-morrow, when the actual figures will be obtained.

There are in the general orders for to-morrow, among others relating to mere routine, an order requiring officers commanding corps to have a medical inspection made and report. Another order, that officers will be held responsible if any spirits are sold in the canteens within their lines. And another, that all stragglers will be arrested by the military police. These are salutary orders, and strike at existing irregularities. The police quarters are in the Old Barracks, near the jail, and is composed of forty men detailed from the battalions.

The men that belonged to the Queen's Own, and who were engaged in the disturbance on Tuesday night, were in the police station of the town till this morning. They were brought before a Regimental Court Martial, and the sentences were that three of the men were condemned to ignominious dismissal from the Regiment; one was held for the further consideration of the Court, and two were acquitted. The determination of the Court is held by all opinions to be just and necessary. The dismissed men will be sent back to Toronto this evening.

A remarkable circumstance took place this morning. While some of the men belonging to the 39th, who came in so late last evening, were excavating a pit to form a cooking range they dug out two skulls, and what portion of the remains that were not wholly decomposed, of two human bodies. The bodies appeared to have been rolled in a blanket, as a small portion of such covering was so placed as made that supposition seem most probable. The skulls were in good preservation, and the men who dug them up secured some of the teeth as treasure trove. Dr. Phelan took charge of the other portions of the skeletons. Two buttons, from military coats, were found beside the remains, with the number "74" marked on them. One of the buttons is fixed as having belonged to an officer's coat; the other to that of a private soldier. The remains were found between 300 and 400 yards to the south-east of the large building that was formerly used as a barracks, and now occupied by the military police. There was no time to seek out the oldest inhabitant, and Niagara can boast of several of these worthies, who is each fairly entitled to claim that distinction, to get a matured judgment as to who the dead men could have been, or how they came to be buried there. Indeed, if it had not been for the merest accidental determination of these men in selecting a place whereon to cook their victuals, these skulls might have lain there in eternal oblivion. And as it is, until some light has been thrown on the subject, the whilom owners of the skulls can scarcely be said to have become famous.—Cor. of the Globe.

They are both good men, and the constituency cannot do better than secure their services. The Conservatives hold a convention on the 5th to select their candidates, and Messrs. McCallum and Hill are mentioned as likely to be selected.

A sad accident happened one mile from Blairton, on the 31st ult., by which William McArthur, an old resident of Marmora, lost his life. The deceased, who lived on the shore of Marmora Lake, had occasion to go down the lake during the day; on returning in the evening, when within a few feet of the shore, the boat upset, throwing Mr. McArthur into the water, and he was drowned. The body was recovered during the night.

Walter and Fred. Roe, aged nineteen and fifteen, sons of the Postmaster at Newmarket, left early on Monday morning for the Holland River for the purpose of fishing, and were to have returned home last evening, but up to this time no tidings of them can be heard. They hired a boat at Holland Landing and went down the river to the bay on Lake Simcoe. Parties were out all night, and to-day several have gone in search. A tug has been engaged at Bell Ewart to search the bay. Some hopes are entertained of their having drifted to some Island, but most grave doubts exist regarding their safety.

The Niagara Camp correspondent of the Liberal says: Some stragglers belonging to the Queen's Own, who arrived by the afternoon trip yesterday of the City of Toronto, behaved in a very disorderly manner. Later on some of them who were drunk got into a difficulty with some residents of Niagara, and afterwards with some of the 44th Welland Battalion. In the scuffle bayonets were drawn, and a very unseemly emeute took place. Chief Constable Curtis was equal to the occasion, and promptly arrested two men of the Queen's Own, and the matter will no doubt be investigated to-day.

The N. Y. Tribune says: Lord Derby's statement in the House of Lords yesterday was calculated to keep alive apprehensions which it was his business to set at rest. His declaration that causes of dispute between Germany and France are likely to recur may be true enough; but he might have made it with just as much truth any other day within the last two years. Peace can only be established on an enduring basis by friendly intercourse and the avoidance of anything pointing to a future war. Lord Derby was not required to remind Germany and France that they were likely soon to renew their quarrels, in that way intimating that they must constantly be on the alert.

A dramatic affair, which created a deep interest among the people of Alsace, has just come before the Assizes of Colmar. Toward the end of the seige of Paris a young sergeant of the Mobile Guards, named Ligez, was killed at Clamart in a sortie. His death was a terrible blow to his father, a poulterer, living at Bourg, who, after mourning the loss of his son for three years, suddenly disappeared. A short time ago he turned up again at Mulhouse, and one evening he was arrested for stabbing to death a Prussian sergeant whom he had met in a beer house. At first he refused to give his name, but eventually he confessed that he had come to Mulhouse "to avenge the loss of his poor boy." The jury, being no doubt composed of Alsatians, who sympathize with their late countrymen, gave the murderer the benefit of extenuating circumstances, alleging that when he committed the crime he was suffering from temporary insanity. The consequence was that, instead of being sentenced to death, Ligez pere was sentenced to five year's imprisonment.
